THE POSTAL NIGHT-BOX. the Süth. Our readers will be pleased to learn that a night box on a totally new plan is to be litted at the Post-Office, whereby any accident by the overfilling of the allotted receptable will be avoided. The form of notification announcing this fact is, however, unusual, the Colonial Secretary having apparently usurped the ing by the wreck. functions of Postmaster General-on account, we presume, of the absence of the latter on leave. It is, of course, well that the functions so ably discharged by the official at the head of the Postal department should be delegated in the event of his absence or sickness to a competent hand; but putting aside the fact that there is, or should be, an assistant P. M. G., we can hardly imagine that the public interests will be a sep16 gainer by converting the Colonial Secretary into a "man of letters." We are sadly afraid that it would be another case of "Sheriff's duties," and with all due deference to the Executive charged with these arrangements would suggest that any official whose time is adequately employed in his present position should be left " to mind his own business." The night box is doubtless a useful institution, but will probably be rendered almost supernumerary when the answer arrives to the Chamber of Commerce memorial on the subject of changing the hour of the mail's despatch. And this view of the case has doubtless prevented the expenditure of Colonial funds in the erection of a standing box in the building heretofore. However, if the Government think it necessary, the public will be only too pleased to have it, and we Provision Merchants. doubt not that, when the Postmaster General returns, he will be glad to find that his views have been carried out, without subjecting him to the chance of a refusal to provide what he deems necessary. His absences are, however, usually so short, that the Government would have shewn more courtesy in waiting for his return to allow the notion to be promulgated by the proper official, instead of casting additional trouble upon the

> THE LESMONA PIRACY. THE account given by the Captain of the Lesmona of the capture of his vessel quite exonerates him personally from any accusation of cowardice or inhumanity. The hoisting of lights as a signal to pirates is a very common trick amongst the native scoundrels who occasionally ship as "passengers" in sea-going vessels. Our readers will probably recollect that the point of a story we recently quoted from an English Magazine, turned upon this truitorous proceeding. That the natives should have been left to take their own chance was therefore but natural.

hard-worked Colonial Secretary.

There are, however, three of these gentry who escaped—two who went to Swatow, and one in hiding here. Just for one day we long for a touch of Chinese law in its merciless severity. Without doubt, these three survivors, could they be found, would, under the native system, suffer for the crime which justly or unjustly they may be assumed to have committed. The escape of these three alone is, at least, suspicious, and we may fairly assume that they had a hand in betraying the vessel. We trust that every effort will be made to hunt up the missing Cantonese. As to the crew, with one exception, that of H. Winter, they seem to have behaved in a despicably cowardly way, which, fortunately for rests of ship-masters, cannot be punished
